My baby girl will be turning 3 next week (Tues!): Happy Birthday, Joella! I'm so proud of you. You're going to be a delight to this world for many years to come. The birthday part of the big 3-0, however, is the time when my parent's generation can start to get a little fraught, as they try to remember what that period of life was like. It's the struggle of, "How can I be the best mom I can be while still letting them have their own time in the world?" The reality is, I can't. We are at the stage of my life where, between work and cooking dinner and picking up my daughter from school and the many other aspects of being a parent, there isn't time left over for the children to do what they need to do in their lives. As I've said many times before on this blog, I hate being the mean mom. I'm going to try really hard to be the mom that I want to be, the person I want to be. And not the super mom that the internet loves to pretend makes it all ok. But I'm going to keep trying. I have some tips for you to take on the road to 3-year-old independence. My baby girl can walk up to the top of the stairs, take off her shoes and socks, and scoot down to her room. That's really an accomplishment for her. She can get into her car seat. She can go to school. She can ride the train all the way to her friend's house. She can sit down for an entire school day without my having to escort her. However, this does not mean that she is ready for the world. She still doesn't like to be in big groups of people. She still doesn't like to have two people in a
