The present invention relates to a method and system for monitoring a plurality of remote tanks. It is known that petroleum products are stored in tanks which are often quite large. For example, some tank farms are several acres in area. As petroleum products are dispensed from these tanks they are replenished from an underlying aquifer which is typically quite large. It is therefore important that the tank farm be carefully monitored to ensure that it is properly serviced. One typical method for monitoring the interior of a tank is to place a camera or the like in the vicinity of the tank. These cameras are connected to video equipment which in turn is connected to a monitor. The monitor may be a so-called closed circuit television (CCTV) monitor which is connected to the video equipment. Alternatively, the monitor may be an open circuit television monitor. The video equipment is connected to a video input of the computer. As is well known in the art, computer software can be used to analyze images taken with cameras. The software can for example be used to compare a target area with a reference area. The comparison can reveal if an area of a tank is dirty or if there is fluid leakage from a tank. It is also known that wind may affect a tank farm. As wind pushes air into a tank, the air is replaced by petroleum. Therefore, images taken with a camera may show a different area of the tank than would otherwise be expected. Wind has an effect not only on the efficiency of the tank farm but also on the amount of petroleum products being dispensed from the tank. Therefore, a wind effect may result in a change in the efficiency of the tank farm which is not adequately monitored.
