Vitamino (1), rocke (2), vino rosso (1), . Redline siberiano russocato (2),(1), . REDLINE redline, the crossbar of the racing car in which drivers compete for victory. In the early days of automobile racing, the drivers lined up on the starting line, the starting position on the starting line being according to the position of the front wheel. The engine of the car started when a red flag was dropped from the starting line to signal the start of the race. Before the invention of the fuel pump, cars had to be taken for service when the car ran out of fuel. This was called "running out of redline." In "Redline (1968)", the Apollo 9 mission, after running out of oxygen, astronauts had to control their car by means of an accelerometer. Today, there are "Redline cars" which automatically restart after running out of redline. Another car racing race, the V de V (6 hours and 30 minutes), is run with pre-set race distance and timing, which makes it easy for both racers and organizers to plan for race events. Other uses Language The term "redline" has been used to describe the style of strict discipline a leader of a large group of people can instill into that group, or to describe a leader who has no regard for the rules of the leader or group, especially for their own interests.

Computing The term "redline" refers to a point in the processing of an electronic design where the complete functioning of the circuit is verified and only "happy paths" are checked. In some CAD software, a "redline" is an annotated drawing version of the layout that is captured in a proprietary CAD data file, and used by the CAD application to define the functionality of a product. This file is used by designers to generate the fabrication drawings that need to be reviewed by technicians to be printed out on the production line for verification. In electronics, a "redline" is the name of a signal usually used to indicate a power-up condition, in which the computer has been turned on, the main power switches have been closed, and the computer has settled down to its normal state.
