Originally a clan of the Kwaialect or Kwagiulth (q.v.) people, they had become distinct from the others by the time of contact with the Europeans. They had first seen white men in 1788. In 1805, Dr. John McLoughlin recorded that the chiefs of these people were called Tagaiill or Saqueeqa. This is probably the tribe that was massacred by the Russian expedition of 1821. From 1822 the Saqueeqa were merged into the Kwakwaka'wakw, although later they became again distinct, because the tribe which was called Nuu-chah-nulth had become dominant among the Kwakwaka'wakw (q.v.). The Siqwaq (or Quaqua (q.v.)) had crossed the Pacific and had settled among the Kwakwaka'wakw on the coast, probably near present-day Gabriola Island. In 1823, J.W. Klippel reported that they were scattered over the Island of Vancouver and named them Saqueeqa, and this name also came into common use by that time. The Nuu-chah-nulth lived on their Coast, and in 1825 (while Dr. McLoughlin was still resident at Nootka) they had so much intercourse with the white men that they adopted their language and dress.Come on in and join the club!
