The Commercial-Vendor Products Group is organized to improve commercial business system of Samsung's products and solutions by sharing them with users and partners. In order to support the new business model, Samsung has installed a variety of centralized business systems which can provide rapid and comprehensive service and support to customers and partners. Samsung Digital Content Converter (KDC), which is the leading converting tool in the world is included in the solution. The new business systems for the support and service were also managed in a way that are easy to use by customers and partners. The system is integrated, and has been improved constantly to provide better service and support to customers and partners. As Samsung's major business unit, the commercial-Vendor Products Group is specialized in providing software to customers. Other areas such as industrial and consumer electronics, telecom and information and communications will also focus on the digital content converters, which is the center of Samsung's future business. Samsung has been supporting the PC and consumer electronic industry as a major contributor to the PC industry since its establishment in 1972, and has continued this mission. Samsung actively developed various PC products and platforms such as the operating system, keyboard, mouse, and display drivers. The company has introduced innovative technologies in the product development process of the operating system, keyboard, mouse, and display drivers, as well as the USB interface in the early 1990s, and has continued to be recognized for the overall quality of its products. Samsung Electronics Information Company announced that, as of April 1, 2009, the company will be redesigning its corporate business structure, creating a new company to focus on commercializing Samsung solutions with the brand name, "Commercial and End-user Solutions". In order to adapt the business model to the changing market environment, Samsung Electronics intends to include the services and business model developed by Samsung Digital Content Converter in the new company. A consortium of five companies, headquartered in Tokyo, Taiwan, Korea, and France, today released the
