Many different technologies have been developed for facilitating distributed, or networked, computing, including the Internet. In fact, the functionality provided by such computing is now pervasive throughout most aspects of commercial and governmental activity. There are several different types of networks that perform various functionalities and those that connect to a network can be connected in a number of different ways. In many circumstances, the functionality being performed by a user on a local or networked computing system is performed in a continuous fashion. For example, a user can select objects on a user interface of a graphical user interface, execute an application on a local or networked computing system, receive the results and allow the user to perform other activities or access other data objects while the application is executing on a server or another computing device connected to the computing system. To enable this type of interaction between a user and one or more applications or other data objects that are located on one or more servers or other computing devices, the server or computing devices can be associated with a continuous activity and the user can use a local or networked computing system to send requests or access data objects on the server or computing device while receiving the results from the server or computing device (e.g., by displaying the data objects on a display while executing the application that provides the data objects). Currently, however, much of the functionality that is provided by these networks and computing systems is not continuous, but instead is performed in discrete units or jobs, such as when a user sends a request to a server to perform a task, receives a result, and then is presented with a display of data that is associated with the task. Many different types of computing devices, such as desktop or laptop computers, mobile devices, smart phones and so forth, can utilize these computing systems. Generally, computing devices send requests for data objects and receive results of the requests. For example, a computing device can send a request for a file or task to a server, the server may retrieve and display the file or perform the task ba244e880a
