A: To properly measure and compare their performances, use non-trained models (like Inception). You will know how fast and efficiently can a network learn a particular task, which cannot be achieved with a pre-trained network. Second, try to find a relevant but still simple problem (like ImageNet), as the results of a domain general network may vary greatly, given the dataset is too small. Third, please change the names to be more readable, e.g. change NNX to ImageNet. This way, it is easier for readers to understand what this networks are actually used for. P.S.: To answer your question. The approach is fine, but I would use pretrained Inception (as well as transfer learning). Q: VSCode loses connection to the database on update I have the following issue using VS Code with an Ubuntu 16.04 LTS Server as OS. Whenever I update the website, the PHP files are written to the database. When I open the workspace again, it fails to connect to the database. I assume that I have some type of connection that keeps the database open but I don't know how to find that. I can open a new workspace using the same workspace and it works without problems. A: The files that were written to the database were actually included in the workspace. When I updated the workspace, the included files where updated by VSCode and created a new workspace, in which the connection was reset. The Solution was to close the previous workspace, delete all files, close the database connection, open the workspace using the commandline and then reopen the workspace in VS Code.
