Field of the Invention This invention generally relates to methods and apparatus for making cosmetic and medical applications of human tissue, and more particularly to methods and apparatus for the implantation of hair follicles in a patient. 2. Description of the Related Art The human scalp is comprised of an outer root sheath of cells that is continually being renewed. Follicles (i.e. hair follicles) are hair shaft producing glands and reside in the outer root sheath. At the beginning of a new hair growth cycle, new follicles are generated and remain in the outer root sheath, before they migrate to the surface of the scalp, and eventually out to the surface of the head and the face. The migration of hair follicles out of the outer root sheath is referred to as hair cycling. Once hair follicles leave the scalp, the skin ceases to be a reservoir for them. Hair follicles are also a good supply of nerve endings, thus, the scalp is a suitable area for cutaneous nerve stimulation. Hair follicles typically grow longer in proportion to the number of hair follicles present. As hair follicles are replaced by other follicles (i.e., hair cycling), their original length is reduced and the total length of hair in a given area is reduced. Thus, once the original hair follicle is grown beyond the desired length, it becomes a new hair follicle that grows an additional new hair, which shortens the total length of hair in that area. It is desirable to have the hair follicles reside long enough to grow a healthy hair, but not to such a length that the natural production of new follicles is inhibited. Some people prefer to have hair grown on their heads, rather than their faces, for a number of reasons. First, the face has a larger surface area for hair to cover than the scalp, thus it is desirable to grow the hair to a length that is not visible. Furthermore, many people are embarrassed by their facial hair. Therefore, a need exists for the implantation of hair follicles into a patient to stimulate hair growth and to reduce the 77a5ca646e
