Tiny Forest is the iPhone OS game developed by Electronic Arts' "Grey Box" division in collaboration with the Princeton Visualization Center and the Princeton Institute for Computational Science and Engineering (PICSCCE). The game's goal is to create a forest by planting trees. As more trees are planted, the trees grow bigger, and more environmental problems, such as increased dust, are created. The player can use a variety of tools to help the trees grow, including watering and fertilizing them. The game was conceived as part of an effort to promote the scientific and mathematical aspects of computer games. As part of the development process, the developer team has been using the game as a laboratory to test the effects of various game features and designs on the perception of numerical abstractions. For example, the team has been experimenting with collision detection systems which minimize the number of special-case calculations, to see how this affects the player's perceptions of the environment.
