Ever since Adobe first released Premiere Pro, I've relied on After Effects to create logos and interactive elements for clients that need a client-side, web-friendly solution. In fact, my whole career has been about creating graphics that perform well on web browsers. That's why I've been able to transition easily from doing graphic design to digital motion graphics, and why I still have a great reputation in the industry. I love After Effects, and I'm especially fond of the effects, actions, and tools for motion graphics. But there's one thing I dislike about After Effects: The way the programs save files. I've also been a big fan of Dreamweaver, which is Adobe's all-in-one solution for developing websites. But when I switched over to After Effects to create web graphics, I didn't find any way to save web graphics files as Adobe SWF format files. As a result, I've been creating logos for clients and then having to create a new logo each time the client asks for a new version. This process is getting old, and not only is it a time-consuming and frustrating process, but it's not scalable. If I have 100 clients that want to get a new version of a logo in a week, I have to re-do a new logo every week. Until now, I've been able to work around this problem by: 1. Saving every image as a Photoshop file. 2. Then opening all the images and exporting the individual graphics as ABOVE files using the Export command in After Effects. This still takes time, but it's not nearly as time-consuming as re-creating graphics from scratch. But there's something else I'd like to point out. Although Adobe offers the Creative Cloud option, in reality, I'm not a big fan of that. The license costs more than I'd like to pay, and the features don't always work the way I'd like them to. So now I'm here, offering a solution that's free for all Adobe Creative Cloud members. What's included in this After Effects project? This After Effects project is designed to eliminate the need for you
