Is it possible? I'm using Scala if it matters, and the target language I want to implement this in is Java. In the example below, I want to have an abstract class Colorable which has an abstract method, isColorable(), that needs to be implemented for any class that needs to be a color. For example, I want Colorable.java to have ColorableSquare and ColorableDiamond implemented: public abstract class Colorable { public abstract boolean isColorable(); } public class ColorableSquare extends Colorable { @Override public boolean isColorable() { return true; } } public class ColorableDiamond extends Colorable { @Override public boolean isColorable() { return true; } } Then, in Main.java I'd like to use a color to select between the implementations and be able to create a Colorable object and call isColorable(): import java.util.Random; public class Main { public static void main(String[] args) { Colorable c1 = new ColorableSquare(); Colorable c2 = new ColorableDiamond(); Colorable c3 = new Colorable(); Random rand = new Random(); if (c1.isColorable()) { System.out.println("c1 is colorable"); } else {
