With the way Photoshop has evolved, tutorials can help beginners learn how to effectively manipulate images and can save professionals time. Photoshop Tutorials for Beginners Image Credit: Adobe You can start Photoshop with the image above on the left. Navigate to File → Open and choose the image file you want to work on. With the image above selected, press Enter to load the image into Photoshop. If you are using a Mac, the file would be PSD. Once you have loaded the image, you will notice that the image is white and has no buttons. The image is on its own layer with no easy access to the various tools and features. To get started, navigate to the Image menu and choose Adjustments and then Levels. This menu will show you various adjustment settings. Click on Curves or Exposure (on a Mac, Image → Adjustments → Expose) and then drag the black points to the left (darkens the picture) or to the right (lightens the picture). You will notice the picture darken in the area where you clicked. With the picture darkened a bit, you will see a dotted line. Click and drag this line around the picture and see the area that was colored darker. You will notice that the area that was dark is now brighter and vice versa. Click OK and then you can select the image layer using the Control (Ctrl) key on your keyboard and then right-click it and choose Adjustments and then Levels. This will open the Levels dialog box and now you can adjust the image as you into the path for the second pass and consequently S_p_{2S} or S_p_{3S} is on the path when S_p_{1S} has just moved. This concludes the proof that path-oriented movements lead to non-instantaneous moves in a game of tic-tac-toe. Note that the order of moves is not important, as it can always be made to yield the same move sequence. Now consider the following thought experiment. What if Alice and Bob play tic-tac-toe on a 2-dimensional square surface without separating the game into 3 colors? In this case, an instantaneous move would lead to an impossible game – Alice will win! However, Alice cannot win, as Bob can always cut the game into two independent parts. That is, Alice's initial path may be such that moving one of the two possibilities along the edge that lies between the initial and final point either terminates the game (first case) or returns Alice to the beginning of the game (second case). Bob can always do the same with one of the paths leaving the game. Now, it can be verified that the above-described process of identifying initial and final points continues to work as Alice and Bob play on the square, even though they can no longer see their own paths. The process is exactly the same – a path is a sequence of moves that either leave or return the game. Each instantaneous move can be identified in the same way as before. Note that each action must create some distinct path, so that the path-oriented vision is well-defined. In sum, it seems that "instantaneous moves" are in fact consistent with path-oriented vision, and those "instantaneous moves" are precisely the non-path-oriented ones. Discussion [#sec:discuss] ===== Is there some more direct proof that the path-oriented vision constitutes a distinct type of visual attention? The answer is no, but this is what we mean by saying that path-oriented vision is not synonymous with instantaneous vision. Instead, it is synonymous with some path-oriented vision. The question is whether and how an observer's movement can cause such a path to be constructed. In the case of tic-tac-toe, we have shown that the observer is prompted to do so because the game starts from a pair of non-adjacent points on the same line

Effects of X-irradiation on skeletal-muscle growth in mice. Effects of X-irradiation on skeletal-muscle growth in mice were examined. On Day 2 after birth, male and female Swiss Webster mice were exposed to 0, 3, 6, 9, or 12 Gy of X-rays. At one-week intervals, the mice were measured for maximal muscle strength using a grip-strength meter. The dose-dependent delay in the growth of muscle strength in mice was observed. The growth of skeletal muscle which had received a dose of 9 Gy or more was significantly retarded, compared with that of animals receiving lower doses of radiation.
