A major problem with the management of experimental autoimmune encephalomyelitis (EAE) in guinea pigs and other animals is that the data so generated are not always reliable. Many investigators recognize the need for objective criteria, but some feel that more time is needed to learn more about the disease and particularly about the animals which are most promising. A great deal of planning and work must go into EAE induction and the control of it. Most major projects are defined long before any clinical evidence of disease appears. The immunological changes which occur during the course of disease will have major implications not only for development of new treatments but also for defining the role of vaccines. In early experiments we observed that passive EAE was very different from that induced in animals immune, thus providing very significant data which otherwise might have been discarded as irrelevant. The present proposal will use this information in the evaluation of immunization regimens. We also observe that the initial emphasis should be on the control of the disease rather than the induction of it. The control of disease is much easier to determine. We plan to study the immunological changes occurring in this control and will compare them to those occurring in EAE animals. We will also modify the control by selecting only animals with major histocompatibility complexes which affect the disease. We will be able to identify with greater certainty the effective components of the transferred lymphocytes and will further investigate the role of the anti-virus factor present in the lymphokine.

Wet-Bulb Globe Temperature Wet-bulb globe temperature, sometimes referred to as WBGT, is a measure of thermal stress experienced by humans in the outdoors, based on the human body's perception of environmental conditions (temperature, humidity, wind speed, and solar radiation). It is a derivative of the Wet Bulb Global Temperature or WBT, which is a sub-set of Wet Bulb Globe Temperature, and is an important metric in the protection of human health (Warnock, Glynn, and Buchanan, 2001). Calculation Wet-bulb globe temperature is based on the difference between air temperature (T_a , °C) and a physically defined parameter called the wet-bulb globe
