Field of the Invention This invention relates generally to geophysical exploration and more particularly to systems and methods for improving receiver performance of marine seismic surveys using a multiple source array.

2. Description of the Related Art In a marine seismic survey, one or more marine seismic vessels are typically used to generate acoustic waves into the water bottom and to detect acoustic signals reflected from the water bottom, the subterranean geological formations and water interfaces. Since the time when such a survey is conducted is typically limited to a short time, at best a few hours, while the survey is conducted, efficiency has been high. However, efficiency in processing of data has been greatly improved by the use of data acquisition systems (also called marine acquisition equipment or marine electronics) in many of the survey vessels. Such marine data acquisition equipment has greatly improved the ability of marine seismic survey operators to gather valuable data. For example, some marine data acquisition equipment is able to record and store continuously or at least intermittently the reflection signals as received at the ocean bottom and at one or more hydrophones placed at the ocean floor, and to record continuously or at least intermittently the noise as received at the ocean bottom and at one or more hydrophones placed at the ocean floor. This information may be recorded on a hard disk or other storage device, or, on some data acquisition equipment, it may be stored in a first-in, first-out (FIFO) type buffer and recorded as soon as the buffer is full. The first data that is written to the buffer is the data that came first from the ocean bottom. For reflection signals that are stronger than the noise, in a typical marine survey the reflection signals from the ocean bottom are recorded and then the noise is recorded. This is typically done so that the noise, which is usually not useful for the survey, is not recorded for as long a time as it would otherwise be. Processing of seismic data for an ocean basin is typically conducted by using computers to process the data in real time or on a delayed basis. However, even though such processing is performed on a computer or other electronic device, the storage system used to store the data collected during a marine seismic survey must be able to store all the data that was collected,
