Tag: Polyface Farms I've been seeing a lot of people who have stopped to look up at the sky recently. Actually that's been pretty much my attitude lately. We've had weeks of rain and it's been a pleasant way to pass some time. But then I look up and the clouds are gray and dark and the weather has turned for the worst. So it was a relief yesterday when the sun came out and the clouds in the east were so much lighter than the ones in the west. Suddenly it was overcast with bright sunshine. The murmurings of discontent at B&H Farm had reached a crescendo in the past week. The big topics were price and supply. The truth is you can't buy food at B&H Farm or anywhere else in the world. The way they do it is to use local farmers and vendors. And the vendors they use are not necessarily local here in the heart of America, they are local farmers everywhere. If you are trying to buy food and it is not organic, regional, or sustainably produced than the only choice you have is to support the local farmer which usually means the organic, local, regional, and sustainable. If you don't support the farmers, those people will not have a market for their product. So when people want to be eco-conscious (or just wanting to save money) they look in the general direction of the world market which is extremely infested with cheap globalized food. They look for stores to buy foods at that
