In a recent review, we delineated four conceptual frameworks for conceptualizing the relation between NCR and LCR: (a) cognition is primarily a collection of specific-domain training-induced capabilities rather than a general-domain factor; (b) LCR entails more than simple cognitive gain from practice; (c) some adaptations to the structure and function of the central nervous system are necessary for cognitive development; and (d) NCR is a necessary precondition for LCR. We use the term neurocognitive gain to refer to specific-domain improvements induced by experience that are due to mechanisms of neuroplasticity (e.g., "brain training") rather than to changes in structure or function. Specifically, neurocognitive gains imply that an individual's brain has the capacity for a specific domain of neurocognitive training, and that training and learning are necessary for an individual to reach a threshold of performance. We propose that neurocognitive gain needs to be distinguished from neuroplasticity as mechanisms of neuro
