Generation of vector beams from cylindrical vector diffraction gratings. The diffraction of a twisted light beam from a square grating (the so-called cylindrical vector diffraction, CDV, grating) by a rectangular hologram can generate a vast set of polarization independent and collimated superpositions of plane waves that can be used to locally control the polarization of light. However, these two approaches are limited, and if one wants to vectorially control the polarization without the need of a complex polarization synthesizer, cylindrical vector diffractive elements can be considered. We show theoretically and experimentally that these elements are capable of generating other kind of vector beams, that are not possible to obtain using traditional holograms. These include cylindrical vector beams of negative helicity and circular polarization, such as Azimuthal and [Formula: see text] modes, which are not attainable using traditional holograms. We demonstrate that the slit-shaped cross sectional profile of such elements defines the properties of the generated beams. Let's face it -- we're addicted to social media. But it's not the Facebook accounts we use everyday that can raise questions about our sanity. It's our most private accounts. How do we manage these crucial accounts and not let our personal lives show? Do you know who your followers are? Twitter allows you to search hashtags and follow users based on their expertise in your industry. Facebook allows you to "Like" pages based on your industry, too. While your personal accounts may be protected, are they really private? Here are five ways social media might be affecting your professional life. 1. Social media can reduce your power as a leader. Are your followers listening to you? The New Yorker quotes NPR host Ken Rudin talking about an incident where he got a behind-the-scenes tour of Facebook before being interviewed on the air. Rudin had a "Facebook story" written about him that included quotes from some of his "fans". Rudin was irate when he found out what had happened. "This is exactly why I don't want a Facebook page or Twitter," he told me. "I go on these sites to connect with people, not to make an appointment with a public relations consultant." We use a social media strategy to connect with our audience. Social media
